

IV. River Training and Flood Control

4.1. Introduction

River training, in its wider aspects, covers all those engineering works which are constructed on a river, so as to guide and confine the flow to the river channel, and to control and regulate the river bed configuration, thus ensuring safe and effective disposal of floods and sediment loads. Stabilizing and training the river along a certain alignment with a suitable waterway is, therefore, the first and foremost aim of river training.

4.2. Objectives of River Training

The term river training implies various measures adopted on a river to stabilize the river channel along a certain alignment with a certain cross section. These measures are required to be adopted because rivers in alluvial plains frequently alter their courses and cause damage to land and properties adjacent to their banks. The main objectives of river training are:

1. To provide a safe passage of flood discharge without overflowing the banks for protection of developed or inhabited area;
2. To prevent the river from changing its course and to avoid outflanking of structures like bridges, weirs, aqueducts, etc.
3. To protect the banks from erosion and improve the alignment by stabilizing the river channel;
4. To deflect the river away from the bank which it might be attacking;
5. To provide minimum depth of flow and a good course for navigation;
6. To transport efficiently the suspended and bed sediment loads.

Depending on the purpose for which a river training program is undertaken, the river training works may be classified as:

1. Training for high water or flood discharge
2. Training for depth or low water training
3. Training for sediment or mean water training

4.2.1. High water training: is undertaken with the purpose of providing safe disposal of maximum floods and thus provide protection against damage due to floods. It is mainly concerned with the most suitable alignment and height of marginal embankments for disposal of floods and may also include other measures of channel improvement for the same purpose. Thus high water training can also be called Training for Discharge. Flood protection can be either passive or active.

- Passive protection: Such as building on high grounds or on stilts above high water marks; may be even today resorted to as a temporary or isolated protection measure.
- Active protection: Allows the continuation of normal human activities in the flood plain during the great part of the flood events.

Complete elimination of flood hazards and ensuing damage for any given region flood plain is practically not feasible, due to the stochastic nature of flood events. It is very seldom, if ever, envisaged from the engineering and economic point of view, since it would lead to
