Abstract—The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week training program on the heart rate (HR) and energy expenditure (EE) of sedentary, middle-aged women. The subjects were 12 sedentary women, 40 to 50 years of age, who were randomly assigned to a 12-week training program or a control group. The training program consisted of three sessions per week of aerobic exercise at 60% of maximum HR. The control group remained sedentary. The HR and EE were measured at rest and during exercise at the beginning and end of the 12-week period. The results showed that the training program significantly increased the HR and EE of the subjects. The HR increased from 68 to 72 beats per minute (bpm) at rest and from 148 to 152 bpm during exercise. The EE increased from 1.2 to 1.4 kcal per minute (kcal/min) at rest and from 2.8 to 3.2 kcal/min during exercise. The results suggest that a 12-week training program can improve the cardiovascular fitness of sedentary, middle-aged women.

It has been found that while on the ground, workers in the construction industry are exposed to a variety of hazards, including physical, chemical, biological, and psychological hazards. The most common physical hazards are falls, slips, and trips, which account for a significant portion of construction-related injuries and fatalities. Other physical hazards include heavy lifting, repetitive motions, and exposure to noise and vibration. Chemical hazards are also present, such as exposure to solvents, paints, and other hazardous materials. Biological hazards, such as exposure to mold and bacteria, are less common but can still pose a risk to workers' health. Psychological hazards, such as stress and mental fatigue, are also a concern, particularly in high-pressure environments. To minimize these risks, employers should implement comprehensive safety programs that include training, hazard identification, and the use of personal protective equipment (PPE). Regular safety audits and incident investigations can also help identify areas for improvement and prevent future accidents.
