Assessing Digital Divides in Higher Education During the Covid-19 Pandemic Brett Payton,Laura Gomez Auriolles,2021 The global transition to online classes in higher education during the COVID 19 pandemic gave researchers the opportunity to evaluate eLearning in ways never before possible This study extends a model for Evaluating eLearning System Success EESS and uses an information systems approach to explore the issue of digital divides within higher education during the global push to online learning Preliminary findings suggest that instructor quality learner quality socioemotional support from university staff and classmates as well as levels of stress all significantly contribute to evaluation of eLearning systems success by students whereas technical system quality information quality service quality educational system quality support system and feature use do not This suggests a very different scenario presented by the transition to online classes during COVID 19 than is found in literature regarding eLearning system evaluation At the same time socioeconomic status SES was found to be a statistically significant predictor for all factors contributing to eLearning evaluation meaning the global push to online classes likely benefitted students of higher SES more than those of lower SES This may have therefore contributed to digital divides within global higher education and have implication for future global inequality

Comparison of Talent Management Evaluation Methods Nina Vöge,2017-07-05 Essay from the year 2017 in the subject Psychology Intelligence and Learning Psychology grade 1 5 Aston University course Learning and Talent Development language English abstract An essay about the different evaluation methods of talent management practices Focusing on issues regarding fairness ethics and diversity According to a recent study from Bersin by Deloitte conducted amongst 220 UK organisations the spending on Learning and Development L D increased from 2014 to 2015 to an average of 1 068 per learner per year It was also reported that the number of training hours per employee rose from 14 5 in 2012 to 16 2 in 2015 This increased focus on L D can be seen as an answer to today s global economy that has created a more complex dynamic and volatile environment in which companies must learn to compete effectively to achieve sustainable growth In addition most organisations are facing internally several challenges including the effective management of talent flow a shortage of needed competencies and an increasingly diverse and mobile workforce which requires them to put a greater focus on L D Against this background it becomes apparent that the high investments in L D and thereby the possibility for consistent skill up gradation are of great importance as what might be an effective training program in the past may not be so in the future However with this also the question of the measurability of L D practices and in turn of their identifiable impact on the organisations overall effectiveness arises In this light this essay strives to explain the importance of the evaluation of talent management practices by contrasting and comparing different ways of monitoring and evaluating the impact and success of these whilst considering possible issues related to fairness ethics and diversity
