Are We Prepared to Manage the Aftermath of a Cyberattack Or Other Failure of the Electrical Grid? - Risks, Vulnerabilities and Consequences of a Prolonged, Widespread Power Outage U S House of Representatives,U S Department of Energy,Federal Emergency Management Agency,2019-11-06 This important report contains the complete transcript of a major House hearing on the American electric grid The purpose of the hearing was twofold 1 To explore the risks vulnerabilities and consequences of a prolonged widespread power outage and understand the primary federal roles authorities and resources available to help communities particularly at the local level manage the aftermath of such a disaster and 2 To assess the efforts and coordination among the participants public private and non profit in the electrical power sector including planning preparedness and mitigation efforts response and recovery capabilities information sharing and standards setting The Subcommittee received testimony from the Federal Emergency Management Agency FEMA the Department of Energy DOE the Department of Homeland Security s National Protection and Programs Directorate the Congressional Research Service CRS the North American Electric Reliability Corporation NERC and representatives from the electrical industry This compilation also includes a reproduction of the 2019 Worldwide Threat Assessment of the U S Intelligence Community There have been numerous congressional hearings on cybersecurity and how to stop the bad guys What has not been discussed in great detail is what the consequence will be from a massive cyberattack that brings down for example a large portion of the electrical grid for an extended period of time The purpose of this hearing is to answer an important question With respect to cyberthreats to the electrical power system what consequences should the Federal Government tell States and local governments to prepare for In other words for how many people and for how long should States plan on being without power The Federal Government does this now for almost every significant hazard that we face Whether it is a category 5 hurricane hitting Miami or an 8 0 earthquake in Los Angeles the Federal Government has realistic estimates or scenarios for States and cities to plan The Federal Government does not have this basic planning scenario for a cyberthreat to the power system and there is a huge disparity in what different groups think is a potential scenario for which States and local governments should prepare And the difference would be significant for local governments if the power is out for a few days it can be an inconvenience but if it is out for several weeks or a month or more the local government has to potentially plan for increased public safety water treatment sheltering or evacuation fuel delivery for generators and many other contingencies Blackout Preparedness California.
