

SSA's Proposed Design for the Disability Evaluation Study

In the previous sections we described briefly the background leading SSA to redesign the process by which eligibility for disability payments is determined, as well as the agency's approach toward the redesign plan. In this section we briefly discuss the general features of the Disability Evaluation Study (DES) as planned by SSA; identify the key survey design and sampling plan, data collection, and operational decisions made to date; and discuss some of their limitations as they relate to the efficiency of the sampling plan and accepted statistical principles and practices. We also lay out alternatives for SSA to consider and rule on prior to making final decisions about the design and operation of the DES in the scope of work for the survey RFP.

INFORMATION GOALS OF THE DES

In response to a recommendation made by the Board of Trustees of the Federal Old-Age and Survivors Insurance and Disability Insurance Trust Funds in 1992 (DHHS, 1992), SSA has initiated a significant research effort, with both a short- and long-term focus, aimed at understanding the growth of the disability programs. DES is the cornerstone of SSA's long-term disability research plan. It is a complex multiyear national survey of the population 18–69 years of age.

The adequacy of any survey design depends on what questions the data collected are intended to answer. SSA has identified in the draft scope of work (SSA, 1996a, pp. 11–12) four major information goals for the survey:

1. Estimate the total number and characteristics of persons in the United States with medical, vocational, and functional limitations or impairments, that is, persons with impairments severe enough to meet SSA's definition of disability; this group would represent the universe of potentially eligible nonbeneficiaries who could apply and meet the current criteria, but who are not now receiving benefits.
2. Identify the number and characteristics of people who are not eligible under the current SSA definition of disability, but who could be included as a result of any changes in the disability decision process.
